The men jumped ashore, and when the seel had exhausted itself somewhat, a lucky cast with a large stone thrown by Senator Ives broke its skull, and the monster was captured.

There were two pickerel in its stomach, one of which weighed twenty-three pounds, but the other was small and had probably been taken merely as an appetizer.

A Brooklyn Man Smothered by a large to the bride and groom is impatiently awaited.

The Senator is very proud of his cap-ture, but he regrets that the cel's skuil was broken, as he intended to send the carcase to the Smithson an Institution. The thing measured eighteen feet in length from shout to tail, and it was there, eight inches in circumference just back of the gills. When put upon a hay-scale at Caldwell it weighed six hundred and thirteen pounds. What its weight is in the scales of justice, Ives will never,
